EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

Defining a family is particularly important for military family health research and for the provision of services and benefits. Studies repeatedly stress the importance of family in supporting military personnel throughout their service. However, much of this research adheres to traditional ideals of family structure despite changing social attitudes and potential nuances between the definition and function of ‘family’. In order to ensure military family research is applicable to modern military families, we need a greater understanding of who a modern military family is.

The first step in this process is considering how the family as an institution is implicitly and explicitly constructed through the definitions contained within policies relating to military families and the military charity sector. Publicly available definitions of military families described in health, education, and social welfare policies and the charitable sectors of the United Kingdom, United States, Australia and Canada were reviewed.

- Definitions of family across the four countries varied according to civil definitions of marriage and relationships. Of the four countries compared in this report, only the US Department of Defense provides a general definition of both a “military” and a “veteran” family. The remainder define or allude to a definition of military or veteran families via policy related to access to benefits or services for those within the military community. This summary of policy definitions shows that most focus on spouses, partners, and children, with some variation across countries:
- The US had the most limited definition of military/veteran families, constraining spouse to married couple relationships only. In contrast, Australian and Canadian definitions were broader, including married couples as well as those in co-habiting (de facto) relationships.
- All countries included biological, adopted, and step-children, provided they were dependent on personnel.
- There were differences in the age at which children were judged to be dependent, for certain services, ranging from 18 years in the UK to 26 years in Canada. All countries include extensions to this age limit for children attending university or higher education and those with mental or physical disabilities.
- All countries include reference to parents within their definitions provided they are dependent on personnel. Other relatives such as aunts or uncles may be considered as dependent but were not always explicitly included.
- Charity definitions were more inclusive than government definitions, including immediate family members such as spouses, partners, and children, as well as parents, siblings, and carers.

Defining family allows military and government policy makers to restrict access to services and benefits that may have increased demand such as housing or healthcare. At the same time, less precise definitions provided in some policy documentation allows the military to be seen to be potentially inclusive to all relationships, including parents, siblings, and close friends. This tension between a more open approach to family and the restrictive eligibility criteria applied to services and benefits may lead to members of families that aren’t reflected in governmental definitions, such as unmarried partners and parents, feeling excluded or unsupported by military services and programmes. Charitable organizations who adopt wider definitions than military or government can then explicitly position themselves as available to support the wider military community while also allowing for restrictions on services to designated family members if resources are limited. Limited definitions of family may also constrain academic research either to studies that align with military definitions or by recruiting family members who meet particular eligibility criteria for accessing services and benefits from military services and facilities.

Recommendations for researchers and future work include:

- Provide a clear definition of military/veteran family in each study and the context behind why these particular participants were selected (for example, a study regarding benefits would explicitly outline the focus on those eligible for said benefit)
- Greater consideration of the function of family in the study design phase so all relevant members are included rather than relying on traditional definitions (for example, who might be affected during a deployment and therefore should be included in the study)
- Create a better understanding of the differences and tensions between definitions of family across policy, community services, and research and their implications
- Improve knowledge-sharing across countries through collaborative research projects
- Improve understanding of how military/veteran families define and structure themselves
- Improve understanding definitions of military family with the research literature
- Improve theory building and testing within military family research
- Explore conceptualisation of military families as distinct or similar from veterans families

INTRODUCTION

Family forms an important part of our identity, social support, and a sense of connection. Traditionally, the Western ideal of “family” has centred on a husband, wife, and children, changes to social attitudes regarding later marriage, childless couples, common-law or unmarried relationships, divorce, same-sex marriage, and non-cohabiting spouses/couples. The increasing role of non-kin friendships and increased cultural diversity within the military mean that traditional definitions may no longer be reflective of the wider military community.

Defining a family is key for military family health research and for provision of services and benefits. Studies repeatedly stress the importance of family in supporting military personnel during their career, on their return from deployment, during illness and injury, and in reintegrating veterans into civilian society following transition out of the Armed Forces. However, much of this research adheres to traditional ideals of family structure despite changing social attitudes and potential nuances between the definition and function of ‘family’. As a result, some military families may not be reflected within this research, especially single personnel, single parents, LGBTQ or others who may rely on other relatives such as parents, cousins, aunts, grandparents or non-kin friendship groups for their primary means of social support.

In order to ensure research in this area is applicable to modern military families, we need a better understanding of who a military family is. The need for this discussion emerged for an invitational roundtable we co-hosted in March 2017 at King’s College London. A range of issues in the field of military families were discussed and one of the key gaps that became apparent was how we define and use the term “military family”. Attendees were keen to explore the meaning of this term to academics, policy makers and practitioners as well as to family members themselves.

Prior to the 2017 CIMVHR Forum in Toronto, a second invitational roundtable was held to begin to address some of these questions. This report, and the supporting documentation contained within, formed the backbone of our discussions during this roundtable, which focused on governmental, military, and charity definitions of military families to reflect on how those providing services represent modern military families. How does the military define a military family? How does this differ from charitable organizations? What are the implications of these definitions for service provision and for research? What are the potential impacts of these definitions of military families?

We would like to thank Rachael, Alyson, Kelli, and Stewart for putting this document together and the associated background research. Working with our counterparts, Dr. David Albright of the University of Alabama, Dr. Galina Daraganova of the Australian Institute of Family Studies, and Nora Spinks of the Vanier Institute of the Family to shape the project and its purpose has helped us to advance these issues and their relevance across and within our allied nations.

METHODS

The purpose of this review was to identify definitions of military and veteran families supported and operationalised by governments and the charitable sector globally. For the purpose of this review, multiple country, policy, and organization-specific definitions of serving members and veterans were accepted. Definitions are provided within the background section for each country (see Appendix).

We performed a search of online, publicly available government websites and documents in four countries: the United Kingdom [RG], the United States [KG], Australia [SM] and Canada [AM] between July 18, 2017 and September 18, 2018. The focus of this search was on the following branches of government: veteran affairs, defence, health, welfare and education. Additional searches were performed in the following; devolved governments within Wales, Northern Ireland, and Scotland as well as England in the UK, government definitions from branches of ten states as examples in the US and provincial and territorial divisions of relevant government bodies in Canada.

A search of selected charitable organization websites was also performed for each country, with representative organizations selected by each country's author. During the initial searches, we did not request access to full documents or reports or contact any of the government branches or organisations for further explanation or comment. Following our discussions at the CIMVHR working group in September 2017, clarifications and additional definitions were included from representatives from each country in early 2018.

Where available, we extracted a definition of a military or veteran family for each government sector from federal and national policies, specific policies, or programs provided to military or veteran families from charitable organizations. To support each definition, links to websites from government, charities, or particular policies are provided in the appendix.

Intra-country syntheses of definitions across sectors and organizations were performed by each country's representative. The inter-country synthesis was drafted by two of the authors [RG & AM].

Limitations

This report is a rapid synthesis of the available definitions of military and veteran families within the United Kingdom, United States, Australia and Canada only. As it was conducted using online sources, it is likely there are additional definitions that are not available in the public domain.

UNITED KINGDOM

Background

Within the UK, the overarching framework of the Armed Forces Covenant forms the basis of much of the policy regarding military/veteran families (also commonly referred to as 'Service' families). This pledge was introduced into legislation and adopted across national, devolved and local government. It is an agreement between the military and civil society that aims to ensure military and veteran families have the same access to services as civilians and, in some cases, may receive priority services (e.g., prosthetic limbs for service-related injuries provided within the National Health Service).

Primary health care for UK military personnel is provided within Ministry of Defence (MOD) funded Defence Medical Centres. Family members deemed to be 'dependents' are able to attend these centres in certain locations if they are unable to access other health care services, such as when they are posted overseas. However, the majority of military family dependents attend health services within the National Health Service (NHS) system (free at the point of delivery service). Educational services within the UK are also provided by the state, with schools receiving additional funding for children from military families to help schools provide support in recognition of the specific challenges children from military families experience and as a commitment under the Armed Forces Covenant. Dependents accessing schools overseas are able to attend Service Children's Education schools near international British bases and assistance is provided for families sending children to independent boarding schools.

In the UK, a veteran is defined as anyone who has served for a minimum of one day in Her Majesty's Armed Forces (regular or reserve).

Government definitions

There is no formally stated definition of "military family" or "veteran family" within the UK, with most definitions provided implicitly within policies that concern access and entitlement to services and benefits. Of these, the majority across the MOD, health, education and social welfare reflect traditional family formations that focus on married relationships and children. The Armed Forces Family strategy is intended to focus military policy on the impact of military life on military families and concentrates on the outcomes of spouses and children but acknowledges that the definition of family may vary in relation to information sharing versus financial benefits. For example, access to particular benefits associated with military service with high cost to the tax payer or limited supply, such as housing, is limited to couples who are married or in a civil partnership. However, there are variations within the application of definitions around entitlements. While there are clear exclusions for unmarried couples in relation to benefits such as Service families accommodation (military-provided housing), compensation and entitlements around bereavement deliberately acknowledge the complexities of family and include looser definitions that include non-married relationships and allow for varied family structures (kin and non-kin) to be reflected.

Despite its increasing importance within UK military welfare policy, the Covenant does not seek to define who a "relevant" family member might be. Other UK policy definitions also do not elaborate beyond "family members" or provide examples (with the implication of eligibility) of potentially eligible family members such as spouses and children. For example, veteran welfare services for those leaving with serious physical, mental or welfare needs outline the role of children and families in supporting transition but do not define these relationships. Such relationships are also not defined within the National Health Service (NHS). However, this omission is likely to be accounted for by the fact that the majority of military family members will seek health care through the NHS alongside their civilian counterparts and therefore eligibility criteria are not applicable in this situation.

'Non-traditional' families (unmarried couples, same-sex, blended families) are considered with policy definitions. Same-sex relationships are recognised both through civil partnerships, a legalised formal relationship introduced prior to same-sex marriage, and through married relationships. Most definitions of children include any child under the age of 18 years who is dependent on military personnel. Consideration as “military children” under MOD education policy is inclusive of biological, adopted and step-children up until the age of 18 years or the cessation of full-time education but clarity is not provided across all policies. Many policies do not state an upper limit for which children are considered dependent; those that do endorse an age of majority of 18 years/cessation of full-time education. There are some limitations regarding entitlements available to foster children under specific circumstances. Older relatives such as grandparents and aunts may be considered as family members under certain policies if they are also dependent on personnel or where they might be considered next of kin.

Charity definitions

While none of the major UK charitable organisations supporting military families specifically define this term, most list the beneficiaries they will provide support and advice to. Such lists are more inclusive than government definitions, including both traditional nuclear family structures (spouse/partner and children) as well as explicit mention of former partners, parents, siblings and carers.

UNITED STATES

Background

In the United States, active duty military have access to TRICARE for their medical insurance. This provides access to care from physicians within a military treatment facility or in the community through a civilian provider that accepts TRICARE (depending on the type of TRICARE the service member elects to enrol). The reserve forces and their families are only eligible for TRICARE if they are on active duty orders and during transition of deactivation from the active duty orders. Most reserve forces do not live near a military installation and therefore receive their care in the private sector. Eligible veterans can receive their health care through the Department of Veterans Affairs (VA). Many veterans, including retirees, choose to receive their health care in the private sector outside of the VA. Although there is a growing trend of more veterans receiving care in the private sector, especially in rural areas, many veterans choose to get some care within the VA and some in the private sector. Military children living within the US receive their education through the civilian sector, through public schools, private schools, charter schools, home schooling, online schools (such as K12), etc. Military children living in US territories and overseas attend one of the 166 Department of Defense schools.

In the US, a veteran is defined as “a person who served in the active military, naval, or air service and who was discharged or released under conditions other than dishonorable” under Title 38 of the Code of Federal Regulations.

Government definitions

The US Department of Defense defines dependants within traditional family formations as the spouses and children of military personnel. These are limited to married relationships only and children under the age of 21 years, with exceptions for children progressing to higher education and those with mental or physical disability that prevents them from supporting themselves and parents who may be dependent on personnel. The definition of spouse was extended to same-sex marriages following a ruling by the US Supreme Court in 2013, although this has been adopted by less than half of states.<sup>1</sup> The military branches vary slightly in their definition, with most referring to Department of Defense and Family Readiness Strategy definitions. However, some branches such as the Air Force allow vaguer definitions of family in order to support non-traditional families. The strictest definitions come in relation to benefits available for military families.

The United States governmental agencies define “military families” by who is eligible for enrollment in the Defense Enrollment and Eligibility Reporting System (DEERS) and the definitions set forth in Title 38 of US Code that outlines veteran benefits within the US. Benefits such as installation access, Department of Defense school access, health care through the Military Health System, benefit enhancements during deployment and housing contain more explicit and restrictive definitions regarding the dependants who are eligible for access to their services. Definitions within states are similar to federal agencies. Monetary services, such as college education costs, are stricter and usually are defined as “spouse”, “surviving spouse”, and “child-biological, adopted, step”, with reference to eligibility as per Title 38 of US Code. State services that support military/veterans and their families with non-monetary services use looser definitions. While blended families are recognised within US military family definitions, these are limited to step-children and parents/step-parents that are dependent on personnel. Couple relationships remain limited to spouses only.

The National Guard has a federal-level family program, which defines family very broadly in their scope and purpose. They simply state that they are supporting and educating families and communities in which the service member resides, as they are geographically separated from military personnel. The guide for families of Reserve forces discusses the family as a larger unit than just the spouse and child dependants, in contrast with many of the federal military programs.

The following people are discussed as family: husband, wife, father, mother, son, daughter, brother, and sister. However, it then discusses entitlements and benefits of family members and discusses people that are eligible based on their enrolment in DEERS. This goes back to entitlement versus inclusiveness.

Veteran families are seldom mentioned outside of the eligibility for TRICARE, surviving spouse benefits, and possible Department of Veterans Affairs benefits. Veterans' families are not tracked within the United States and most support for any veterans' families come from charities. Some charities (not limited to) that specifically address veterans' families are: Veterans Families United, Veterans Coming Home, and the Institute for Veterans and Military Families. No specific definition is given that encompasses veteran families. This term would be expected to be defined more broadly, however, due to it being less tied to entitlements than active military. Access to certain VA benefits was extended to same-sex veteran families following another Supreme Court ruling.<sup>2</sup>

Charity definitions

Charitable and non-profit organizations that work with military and their families continue to centre on spouses and children. Many do not provide clarification and simply state that they work with "military and their families"; however, those that do provide some specifics adopt more liberal definitions of "military family" that include parents, grandparents, and aunts and uncles. Reference is made to carers with no stipulation on the type of familial relationship.

AUSTRALIA

Background

Within Australia, education and health care are provided by a mixture of government-funded, government-subsidised, and private providers. Australian Defence Force (ADF) members can receive health care from Department of Defence-funded services but may also use the general health care system with costs often met by the Department of Defence. The family of ADF members access the general health care system but, under the national ADF Family Health Program, dependants can apply to be reimbursed for some out-of-pocket expenses. Ex-serving ADF members and their families also receive health care through the general health care system but, depending on their eligibility for support, ex-serving ADF members, war widow(er)s and eligible dependents can have some or all of their use of these services (public or private) funded by the Department of Veterans' Affairs (DVA). Education is provided by government and private providers, with responsibility for government-funded schools largely devolved to the states. Families of ADF members receive their education within the general system but, in some instances, can be eligible for education assistance from state governments or from the Department of Defence.

In Australia, a veteran is defined as someone who has “rendered eligible war service”, or “is a member of the defence forces who on or after 31 July 1962 was outside Australia, but not on operational service, who was killed or injured by the action of hostile forces”. However, eligibility for DVA services does not depend on the strict definition of “veteran”. Other current and ex-serving ADF members (including reserves and cadets) who have not been on operational duty can also be eligible for benefits and pensions from the Department of Veterans Affairs depending on their individual circumstances and the specific benefit or assistance.

Government definitions

There is no overarching Australian government definition of a military or veteran “family”. Instead, definitions are usually only articulated in reference to eligibility for benefits or entitlements and tend to focus on specific relationships—usually “partners” and “dependents”—rather than a general notion of “family”. Recognition of family relationships is usually confined to relationships within households.

The ADF follows Australian civil law in explicitly recognising legally married couples and co-habiting (de facto) relationships (same-sex and opposite sex); both forms of relationship are often classed as “partners” or “spouses”. Under Australian law, a de facto relationship is defined as one in which a couple is not married to each other, and are not related by family, but “have a relationship as a couple living together on a genuine domestic basis”. In most instances, there is no specific time-period that has to have passed before a relationship can be recognised as de facto but the duration of the relationship might be considered as a factor in formal recognition. Partners from civil partnerships are also recognised. Legislation introducing same-sex marriage was passed in Australia in December 2017. Before this, de facto same-sex couples already had the same entitlements as opposite-sex de facto couples and their families in areas such as social security and family assistance, aged care, veterans' entitlements, child support, and family law.

The category of “dependents” usually includes children who ordinarily live with the ADF member and are aged under 18 or 21 (according to the specific benefit or service condition). In most instances, partners or children who live apart from the member because of the member's posting in a different Australian location (an “unaccompanied” posting), or who are temporarily away from home for their education, are also included in eligibility criteria as “dependents”. Children from blended families are also considered in line with wider definitions within civil Australian law. In some circumstances, the ADF and/or Department of Defence also recognise other “dependents” and these do not necessarily have to be the biological family of the ADF member. For example, a person acting as a guardian or housekeeper can be considered a dependent if the ADF member has a dependent child and no spouse or partner or if their spouse or partner is an invalid or absent on ADF duty. Other people than partners, children, or guardian/housekeepers can also be recognised as dependents, or as having an interdependent relationship with the ADF member, depending on the circumstances; the ADF member usually has to apply for special recognition of such relationships. The definition of “dependents” is complex but focuses on whether the person is dependent on the ADF member to provide a home and care and if they have a close personal relationship.

Other family members, such as siblings or parents, are not usually recognised by the ADF unless they are dependent on military personnel for financial or interdependent support and personal care. Non-dependent parents, including step-parents, can be eligible for “Family Assistance” for attending a Court of Inquiry (an Inquiry to determine the facts or circumstances surrounding a death, accident, injury, or other serious matter pertaining to the ADF). Parents and siblings are also eligible for “Family Assistance” for attending a Coronial Inquest.

Definitions of family can vary across different organisations and according to the specific benefit in question. The Defence Community Organisation (DCO), an organisation that sits within the Department of Defence, does have a specific definition of “family”; this includes spouses and cohabiting partners, children who ordinarily live with the ADF member, and the parents of single ADF members. This definition is used to define eligibility for DCO assistance (e.g. access to social workers, the Defence family helpline, “family” events, education or employment assistance, home assistance, etc.) and is taken into account in DCO advice to the broader Department of Defence. Because the DCO is one of the few organisations to explicitly define “family”, their definition is often used in other contexts such as research on Australian military families. Defence Families of Australia (DFA), the official body appointed by the Australian government to represent the views of Defence families, also uses the DCO definition.

The Department of Veterans’ Affairs (DVA) uses similar definitions as the ADF when specifying eligibility criteria for benefits or assistance—i.e. partners and dependents - but also customarily includes the widows or widowers of deceased ADF members. The Veterans and Veterans Families Counselling Service (VVCS), an agency that comes under the broad DVA umbrella, recognises a much wider range of family relationships than the other government agencies listed here. “Family members” (of a current or former ADF member) who are potentially eligible for VVCS counselling include siblings, parents, widows/widowers, interdependent partners, ex-partners up to five years from separation, ex-partners who are co-parenting a child under 18, and children of any age (i.e. including adult children).

The Australian states provide limited specific assistance to members of the military, veterans, or their families (or “war widow/ers”). In each state, eligibility for benefits rely on pre-existing eligibility for Federal DVA benefits and thus do not in themselves require a specific definition of military or veteran “families”.

Charity definitions

Australian military charities often describe themselves as supporting the family of current or ex-serving ADF members but they rarely define who counts as a family member. Where definitions are given they are again usually focused on spouses, cohabiting partners, widows/widowers, and dependent children.

CANADA

Background

Canadian Armed Forces (CAF) members are provided healthcare federally within a specialized system operated by the Department of National Defence (DND). This system does not provide healthcare to family members except in exceptional circumstances. It also does not provide healthcare to veterans or their families. In Canada, healthcare insurance and service provision are governed at the provincial level for military and veteran families. The delivery of education and health services is primarily devolved to provincial and territorial governments, with the exception of two federal health bodies.

In Canada, a veteran is defined by Veterans Affairs Canada as a former member of the Canadian Armed Forces who successfully underwent basic training and was honourably released.

Government definitions

Veterans Affairs Canada (VAC), Department of National Defence (DND), and the Canadian Armed Forces Morale and Welfare Services (CFMWS) did not have a general definition of a family used by any parties, or uniformly within each department.

VAC and DND definitions are policy specific and tied to eligibility for services or receipt of funds. Typically, they referred to a spouse or survivor of the service member or veteran as defined by legal marriage or common-law status, defined by a length of period cohabitating in a relationship. The definition of a legal marriage in Canada was extended to same-sex marriages through federal legislation in 2005.<sup>3</sup> Definitions of spouses were typically restricted to current relationships, and did not apply to fractured or previous relationships, except to define benefits from VAC related to relationships during service. Dependents were defined broadly as biological, adopted, or step-children; more specific criteria around age and living arrangements were defined as they related to the particular service or benefit. The definition of family members was more inclusive in situations where services were not being directly provided or were provided free of charge (e.g., Road to Mental Readiness website). VAC definitions are also tied to service and benefit-specific eligibility criteria of the serving member. For example, the VAC Family Caregiver Relief Benefit did not provide a definition for family, but restricted eligibility to veterans who are receiving a disability award and qualified for an informal caregiver; the ongoing need was 12 months or greater, the informal caregiver was 18 years or older and not receiving payment for services, and the veteran did not live in a long-term care or nursing home.

The CFMWS, composed of civilian staff funded by non-public funds and the Canadian Armed Forces, is a separate agency from DND within the federal public administration that provides services to military families, broadly defines a military family on their website to include parents of single serving members, siblings, as well as traditional spouse or partner and children. CFMWS uses a more specific definition of a military family based on exemptions under the Income Tax Act when describing eligibility for specific services, such as the CFONE card. Spouses include married, cohabiting, and common-law relationships (including same-sex); dependent children are defined by both age and capacity. Older family members who collect a pension while residing with the serving member are also included.

Few provinces had explicit content related to military families; as such, few had documents defining military families. No province/territory had a general definition that applied to all sectors; definitions that did exist varied by sector. No province referred to military families or had military family specific resources, legislation, or laws within their searchable, web-based Ministry of Education website. The exception was Saskatchewan, where the Government of Saskatchewan developed the Saskatchewan Scholarship of Honour for the families of fallen or disabled CAF soldiers. Eligible military family here was defined as a spouse or child of a serving member. Of note, the Canadian Counsellors and Psychotherapy Association recently developed a resource for school counsellors on working with military families in Canada, in partnership with the Vanier Institute for the Family.<sup>4</sup>

Ministries or departments of Health in six of twelve provinces referenced military families in relation to eligibility for provincial health insurance; all provinces specified families as being spouses and/or dependents. Ontario and Alberta specified definitions of spouses and dependents of serving members; both definitions outlined criteria for what constituted a spousal relationship (seemingly rooted in provincial policy/law on those terms) and age and capacity criteria for what constituted a dependent. Federal health care bodies (Health Canada, Public Health Agency of Canada) did not mention military families in their web-based resources or searchable through their web-based material.

Non-traditional families are reflected in many of these definitions. Same-sex relationships are included within married, cohabiting, and common-law relationships and blended families addressed through the inclusion of step-children. Older relatives are also considered, provided they are dependent on service personnel.

Charity definitions

Canadian charitable organizations providing support to military and veteran families typically did not specify a family definition, with the exception of the Vanier Institute of the Family. The Vanier Institute defines the family most broadly, without eligibility criterion based on cohabitation; instead, the definition focuses on the role of support and intangible ties binding group members. Often, family was defined post hoc by the types and breadth of services provided to the military families. For example, Wounded Warriors Canada funds counselling programs for couples including an active service personnel member and True Patriot Love provides grants for services and programs aimed at military-connected children and youth.

GOVERNMENT DEFINITIONS

Of the four countries compared in this report, only the US Department of Defense provides a definition of both a “military” and a “veteran” family (Table 1: Overview of similarities and differences in government definitions of military/veteran families). The remaining countries define or allude to a definition of military or veteran families via policy related to access to benefits or services for those within the military community. Where such benefits have tangible financial reward for military service, such as eligibility for housing or healthcare, definitions tend to be limited to heteronormative family structures such as spouses and children, with inclusion of older relatives provided they are dependent on personnel for support. Non-dependent relatives such as siblings and other relatives may not be explicitly mentioned in policy definitions but may be considered within definitions of family if they meet eligibility criteria for dependence.

Definitions of family across the four countries varied according to civil definitions of marriage and relationships. The US had the most limited definition of military/veteran families within the available documentation, with only married couple relationships deemed to be eligible for most of the services provided. In contrast, Australian and Canadian definitions were the broadest, including married couples, common-law partnerships, as well as co-habiting (de facto) relationships. Unlike Australia, Canadian definitions of cohabiting relationships typically included relationship duration specifications in line with common-law partnership status in civilian sectors. Both UK and Australia definitions separately recognised civil partnerships for same-sex couples. All countries recognized same-sex marriages within definitions of dependents. The exclusion of non-married but long-term, cohabiting relationships from military definitions of families may prevent such families from accessing military support. This may result in couples entering marriage before they ready in order to access particular benefits such as housing and healthcare, with implications for relationship satisfaction and breakdown.

Table 1: Overview of similarities and differences in government definitions of military/veteran families

Overarching government definition	UK	US	AUS	CA
Definition of military family	X		X	X
Definition of veteran family	X		X	X
Eligibility for benefits and services
Spouse/partner
Married (including same-sex)
Common-law/de facto	X	X
Children/adolescents
Children (biological, adopted, step)
Other family members
Parents (if dependent)
Other relatives (if dependent)		X	X
Siblings	X	X	X	X

* Includes recognition of same-sex civil partnerships/unions in the UK and Australia

Other dependents are largely limited to children, with policies across all countries including both biological, adopted, and step-children under this definition, provided they are dependent on personnel. There were differences in the age at which children were judged to be dependent, ranging from 18 years in the UK to 23 years in the US for some benefits; ages vary for dependent children in Canada and Australia according to the particular benefit on offer. All countries included extensions to this age limit for children attending university or higher education as well as those with mental or physical disabilities. All four countries explicitly refer to parents within their definitions regarding eligibility for services provided they are dependent on personnel. Other relatives, such as aunts and uncles, may also be included within definitions of dependents but this tended to be implied rather than stated.

CHARITY DEFINITIONS

In contrast to government definitions, those provided by charitable organizations within the four countries tend to be more inclusive than government definitions. Many did not define family and some, particularly in the US, continued to align with government definitions. However, among those that did discuss family members, the majority continue to focus on immediate family members such as spouses, partners and children but indicated consideration of other family structures by the inclusion of support and information services for parents, siblings and carers. By adopting wider or unclear definitions, such organizations explicitly position themselves as available to support the wider military community but allowing them to refer those seeking help onto appropriate services to limit resources to designated family members if required.

CONCLUSIONS

Defining family allows military and government policy makers to restrict access to services and benefits that may have increased demand such as housing or healthcare. Conversely, less precise definitions provided in some policy documentation allow the military to be seen to be potentially inclusive to all relationships, including parents, siblings, and close friends. However, differences between this more open approach and the explicit eligibility criteria for services and charitable organizations may lead to family members who aren't reflected in governmental definitions, such as unmarried partners and parents, feeling excluded or unsupported by military services and programmes despite the important role they play in supporting current and former military personnel. These restricted definitions may also limit academic research that aligns with military definitions or that relies on recruiting family members from military bases and facilities who meet particular eligibility criteria. Charitable organizations who adopt wider definitions explicitly position themselves as available to support the wider military community while allowing for restrictions on services to designated family members if resources are limited.

RECOMMENDATIONS FOR RESEARCHERS

Following the discussions of the working group, eight recommendations for researchers working with military families were suggested to help provide understanding across international studies and increase diversification of research in this area. These include:

- Provide a clear definition of military/veteran family in each study and the context behind why these particular participants were selected (for example, a study regarding benefits would explicitly outline the focus on those eligible for said benefit)
- Greater consideration of the function of family in the study design phase so all relevant members are included rather than relying on traditional definitions (for example, who might be affected during a deployment and therefore should be included in the study)
- Create a better understanding of the differences and tensions between definitions of family across policy, community services, and research and their implications
- Improve knowledge-sharing across countries through collaborative research projects
- Improve understanding of how military/veteran families define and structure themselves
- Improve understanding definitions of military family with the research literature
- Improve theory building and testing within military family research
- Explore conceptualisation of military families as distinct or similar from veterans families
